Duwamish Tribe: The First People of Seattle

Since 1975, Honorable Chairperson Cecile Hansen, “face” of the Duwamish Indian Tribe, has fought for something fundamental for her tribe – federal recognition and the health and social services that come with it

Six years ago, the City Council of Seattle, world’s largest city named after an indigenous person, voted unanimously to change the second Monday in October from Columbus Day to Indigenous Peoples Day. Hansen notes, “[T]he city is named after our chief. They honored him but they are not honoring his people today.” Under the 1855 Treaty of Point Elliott, the Duwamish gave up the 54,000 acres of land and natural resources upon which the city was built but have never received benefits due under the treaty. “We do have a place where we can gather,” said Hansen. With funds from community, the Duwamish Longhouse and Cultural Center was erected in 2009 on the archaeological site of a Duwamish village inhabited from 600 A.D. to the 1800s. Visitors are welcome to learn about culture, art, and traditions of the Duwamish tribe,

The Henry Moses Aquatic Center in Renton was named after Henry Moses (1900-1969) the great, grandnephew of Chief (Seattle) Sealth.
