PROGRAM

Ben Weise of the Contra Costa Resource Conservation

District spoke on carbon farming in Contra Costa County. The group started in 1941. The concept was to expand a green planet for our area. They have been involved in projects such as improving salmon breeding and expanding areas of increased farm development and production. The goals are to reverse worsening soil health, improve corn, fruit and nut growth potential, and put carbon back into the soil to make it blacker and healthier in order to counteract the effects of pesticides, additives and over-fertilization.

Increasing carbon content in the soil helps it stay together and not disintegrate. This helps biologic activity and prevents the weakened soil from blowing away and maintains the soil's health. In addition, hedge rows also protect the land health. Farm land requires better soil integrity than forests. If farm soil deteriorates badly, oak trees will take its place and prevent farming.
