PROGRAM

Our speaker, Jenny Lew, presented the history of the Chinese in America. The Chinese started emigrating to this country in 1800 but were heavily discriminated against while working in the gold country building railroads. They also worked as fisherman, miners and farmers. But they were continuously excluded from full participation in society during that period which made them feel almost sub-human. The Chinese were treated as illegal immigrants.

In 1882, the U.S. passed the Exclusion Act which barred them from citizenship. They had to come into the country under a present resident's name. Upon arrival, they underwent a series of complex interrogations. The Exclusion Act was eventually repealed in 1843 but limited Chinese immigration to 20,000 per year.

The Chinese were also treated poorly in their own country when European invaders arrived. They were abused with Opium and other things. This became known as the Opium Wars. After Mao came into power, the Chinese were felt to be Communists in the U.S.
