About our Guest Speaker & her presentation:

"Fixing the Education Gap To End Generational Poverty"

The coronavirus has put the spotlight on parents' role in their children's education - with caregivers taking on the job of teacher as schools move to non-traditional instruction. For many, even in the best of situations, it's stressful. But consider the estimated 30 million American parents and caregivers who lack basic literacy or English skills.

Family literacy - with parents or caregivers and children learning and growing together - has the power to change the trajectory for families - now for generations. Louisville-based National Center for Families Learning's Sharon Darling pioneered the concept right here in Kentucky and over the past three decades has spread her research-proven model to 39 states, more than 160 communities, and 49 reservations. NCFL's leadership has inspired many other organizations and countries to tailor the family literacy model to their communities.

Thursday, Sharon will discuss why family literacy is the foundation needed to make real change, how the NCFL model is evolving with communities, and what that means for Louisville.
