PROGRAM LAST WEEK by Scott Hunter

President Franklin Roosevelt's private secretary paid a visit to the Aiken Rotary Club.

Dressed in period costume and even speaking with a Boston accent, author Kathryn Smith gave Rotarians details of Marguerite "Missy" LeHand's amazing life. Smith is a former reporter for the Aiken Standard and now lives in Anderson. She is the author of "Gatekeeper: Missy LeHand, FDR and the Untold Story of the Partnership That Defined a Presidency."

LeHand became the private secretary for Franklin Roosevelt when he was an attorney in New York. She kept that role during Roosevelt's political life, including most of his presidency. She was the first woman to serve as private secretary for a president. Smith termed LeHand "The Gatekeeper" because her role included determining who gained access to the president. Her office was adjacent to the Oval Office. Because of that, LeHand was influential in the making of policy. Smith said LeHand "could almost read his (Roosevelt's) mind."

LeHand had a professional relationship with the president, but because she lived in the White House and was on duty 24/7, the president also treated her as a confidant and close friend.

She traveled with Roosevelt, including the president's trips to Warm Springs, Ga., to aid in his polio rehabilitation efforts.

Missy LeHand spent 12 years assisting Roosevelt in the White House. However, she suffered a stroke at age 44 and died three years later.
