Ellen Nelson says her late father was her inspiration

The Review

Some advice for high schoolers

Not that anyone really asked for advice, but I feel obligated to share it, just because I actually survived high school, and because I think I learned a lot about this time of life. But I am no longer in that time of life, and this knowledge is useless to me now unless I share it.

1. These years don't define you. Don't spend your time attempting to construct an image of yourself, because very soon it will be shattered to pieces, and you will find who you really are. You can't change who you are, although right now you may desperately be trying to. I am telling you that it is a futile effort, and that you will catch up with yourself. Stay true.

Many books begin with a dedication to a loved one, so Ellen Nelson decided it was just the right way to begin a book-inspired song — and she knew just who to honor.

Ellen chose her father, Jim Nelson, who died of a rare form of cancer five years ago. "I miss holding your hand," are the first words of the tender composition rendered more beautiful still with her sonorous voice and plaintive piano chords.

Her veneration of her father is intermingled with references to a book in her piece, "Where's the Healing in the World Today? (When Brains Melt)," and that combination has earned the Lakeridge High School junior second place out of 2,000 entrants in the National Teen Reading Contest.

The contest, which challenged teens to create a work involving the science-fiction novel "The Healers," awarded Ellen $3,000 to be split 50-50 with her school, community or library.

"I don't know what to say," Ellen said after learning of her accomplishment Monday. "It's so exciting. I'm so happy."

Her friend of 11 years, Lakeridge
