South Africa faces many societal and economic challenges, besides COVID19.

In recent years the AIDS epidemic, care of vulnerable and orphaned children, domestic violence and the growing epidemic of drug abuse have all attracted the attention of Government and a network of NGOs dealing with these important issues. However care of children and adults with disabilities, has to a large extent been ignored. The general assumption has been that African families will take care of their vulnerable members. However as the extended traditional African family structure changes, and economic hardship deepens, this is often not the case.

Government hospitals in the Durban area frequently have frail elderly or disabled patients being abandoned by their families. Community caregivers encounter disabled people being exploited for their grants or abandoned by family members.

Very few step down or care facilities exist in Kwa-Zulu Natal for the poor; the few Government run old age homes and chronic care hospital wards have long waiting lists or are being shut down.
