Paranormal Patrol

Group shares experiences exploring the after life

Most neighbors just partner up on yard sales. These three Clarksville residents started a business investigating reports of the paranormal.

The group started doing ghost-hunting trips, checking out sites rumored to have paranormal activity, and now the fledgling business they call Paranormal Patrol even has a potential TV deal in the works.

Johana Thompson said that for as long as she can remember, she's experienced things that defied explanation, like visions, night paralysis and paranormal sightings.

"I believe I am an empath," said Thompson. "For me, this is all about finding answers, and trying to make sense of it."

Her friend, former neighbor and ghost-hunting colleague Mindy Finney said she's always been into scary stuff, ever since she lived in one of the oldest homes in her Georgia hometown of Macon, which she believed was haunted. Finney believes that she is far from the only person who has an interest in the paranormal.

"I feel like most people are intrigued," she said.

Thompson agrees: "I think everybody has a genuine curiosity."

That includes Thompson's fiance Shae Fiser, who rounds out the Paranormal Patrol trio. Fiser's day job is with the Davidson County Sheriff's Office, but it's his gig with Paranormal Patrol that most piques his interest.

The group uses various technology, from the spirit box, which sweeps radio frequencies to provide white noise so paranormal entities can come through more easily when attempting to communicate; to the SLS camera, a video monitor that he described as a structured light sensor that picks up light that can't be seen with the human eye.

They also use what they call a "Boo Bear" to help communicate with the spirits of children. It's a teddy bear with an electromagnetic field sensor, or EMF meter, built into it that lights up if it detects a spike in electrical currents. Rounding out the toolbox: a simple flashlight that they ask spirits to simply turn on or off to indicate their presence or answer yes or no questions.
