Former educator Michael Stone who now works as a lead with LED's Innovation Hub gave an example rich presentation supporting why this is a linchpin moment after 70 years of development in artificial intelligence aka. AI. His presentation's focus was based on strategies and uses of AI for both the professional in the workplace and the casual user at home. Specifically, his talk dealt with generative AI which creates content from context as he compared that to a Google search which responds to a specific query with content results from the web. Currently, programs such as GPT 4.0 has been training its artificial intelligence with the use of 220 billion data pieces and the results are astonishing. Of the examples Michael presented he showed us how to ChatGPT can produce content based on a topic provided. Usage of this specific program has gone up to 100 million users just within a two month time. This versus a program such as Netflix which took 18 years to hit the same level of usage. He showed us programs such as DALL-E which can create pictures from a text subject, AI chef which can produce recipes based on a picture of ingredients from your refrigerator. Additional examples included AI for dating, AI for creating songs and jingles, and even AI that can translate recordings in foreign languages and reproduce them in the accent of the presenter. The final thought and focus of most Rotarians questions involved what government regulations should be put in place to make sure the use of AI is safe and productive and that it does not lead to world domination by computers.
